In some instances, as indicated in yesterday's dispatches, they have provided themselves with modern guns of large caliber and with the best modern small arms, but whether they have learned to use these implements any better than they did at the time of the war with Japan is doubtful. Side by side with these modern rifles and cannon in the Chinese army may be seen a motley collection of

of the Chinese, however much he may be willing to die in battle, is weakened by the defects in the and incompetence of his native officers. The military profession is of but small account in China, even Q. What State took more prizes officers are rated low in the social scale. Until very recently, at least, the Chinese "army of the eight banners," as it is called, has numbered nominally between 230,000 and 330,000 men, comprising eight corps each of Manchus, Mongols and Chinese. In addition there is the Ying Ping, or national army, with a nominal strength of from 540,000 to 660,000 men, who really form a territorial militia. These, with mercenaries and irregulars, make up nominally a force of 1,000-000 men on a war footing, or of 300,000 on a peace footing. The figures look formidable, but they give an exaggerated idea of the strength of China, even supposing that all divisions of the army in the present case baye joined hands with the Boxers. Nor is it to be forgotten that the Chinese soldiery, except in the case of a few regiments under European officers, and are undrilled. They are not taught to skirmish or to shoot. The sole recruiting test is the ability to lift a
